Once not too ago, life was in full of vibrant colors and aromatic scents as were these flowers in my apartment. As they dried out, I discovered they were even prettier dried. I kept them displayed in the empty food jars bottles that were bound for the recycling bins. Today they are subjects for the photography I would be doing while @walkinginnewark as there is so much life and greatness here. I have high hope in the universe that once this pandemic is over, we will see a a major shift on how underdogs and barely appreciated and overused people are being treated. Not just in the meantime, but long after like how fresh flowers become dried flowers still serve and have a purpose worth displaying.
